Aging and Economics

already involved in answering this need, but as the marketplace transactions of ordinary people grow in number and complexity, so does the need for competent home economists to assist them. In the area of financial markets, for instance, consumer involvement has grown tremendously over the past decade. So has the need for competent, unbiased assistance. This is a role that home economists could assume to protect and promote the long-term economic well-being of individuals and families.

Finally, as citizens and professionals in the world community, home economists could contribute to the efforts of other nations, particularly less developed nations. They could provide needed assistance in terms of research, data analysis, program planning, and public policy development. Armed with adequate knowledge of local conditions, customs, and traditions, home economists could apply their knowledge and expertise to the problems to identify and develop family and community support systems for the elderly and aged and help develop educational and service programs to assist individuals and families in providing for their needs.

The problems associated with world aging are not insurmountable, but they will require careful study, planning, and change.
